Sean O'Hanlon founded the American Biofuels Council in early 2007, and has served as CEO since its inception. He became interested in agricultural, environmental, health, economic and energy issues while traveling internationally during the late 1990's and began investigating the potential benefits of alternative fuels. His interest in biofuels increased greatly after the events of 9/11 and during his research he saw the need for a unifying organization to bring all interested parties of renewable fuels together. Currently his duties include serving as senior analyst as well the director of education and public relations.

Over the years Mr. O'Hanlon has developed contacts in every facet of the biofuels industry from Seattle to São Paulo, has authored more than 200 articles on biofuels, co-created and developed the Certified Biofuels Educator (CBE) program, served on the Center for Hemispheric Policy Energy Security task force, chaired round table discussions; international conferences, regularly gives interviews to the media and has been described as "One of the most influential voices in biofuels".
